EUSA* is a reaction to the homogenization of European and American cultures, a sentimental and idealized depiction; an homage to a heritage that isn't ones own.

EUSA documents American-themed places in Europe and European-themed places in America. Primarily portraiture, the photos are sentimental and idealized, a reaction to the homogenized, indistinguishable common world community, a direct result of globalization. In »Olde-World« towns in California, Wisconsin or Iowa the respective Danish, Swiss, or Dutch heritage being celebrated is ostensibly that of a significant segment of the local population and reflects a desire for authenticity. In other places the »heritage« is blatantly designed and marketed purely for its entertainment and touristic value. This is also the case with many of the Western theme-parks visited in Europe. Many of the pictures make it hard to locate when and where they were taken: are we in the US or somewhere in Europe? EUSA is an ambitious project that raises questions about authenticity, cultural identity, and appropriation, about the function of »other-directed« places and their enduring appeal.

Canadian Naomi Harris is an environmental portrait photographer who seeks out interesting cultural trends to document through her subjects. EUSA is her third book after America Swings (2008/2010), and California Dreaming (2007).

Hello, Carolina.

*Of course, Europe at the moment is in a situation far from perfect. But at least European countries try to stick together to solve issues like migration, while England has decided to separate from the Union. I'm afraid that neither of us can solve all the confusion that's going on worldwide. But confusion is the basis of Naomi's EUSA book. The confusion she shows in her photographs is often funny, ironic and entertaining. Let's believe in the positive energy from these mixed-up identities and the reconciliation effect of them.*

Greetings

Erik
