Breathtaking images of a road trip through the peerless landscapes of America

Rob Hammer is a seasoned photographer. Besides his successful commercial career, he developed a rich body of personal work that revolves around his numerous road trips through his homeland, America. Roadside Meditations is a subtle reflection on the natural and sometimes mundane beauty of this vast country. His images speak about the freedom to be on the road, about the educational, transformative, and meditative character of the time spent traveling. Hammer's intuitive and nuanced photographs can be read as metaphors for the human psyche. At the same time, they are candidly capturing the passing of time reflected in the manmade structures within the landscape. Like a road trip, the sequence of images lines up to become a road itself, on which the viewer's eye travels and experiences the inimitable American landscape.

From the foreword by Nick Yetto:

Rob's journey is the art. His life is a journey, in the literal sense, which makes his life the art. These meditations are not pretty pictures. They're punch-outs from the eternal. A place, and all that it was, and will never be again; an instant and all of everything in the universe that swirled around it; a person, and what he was feeling, thinking, in that millisecond of his life. Click. And gone.

From the text by Rob Hammer:

People tend to ask, "don't you get bored out there?" Until the first time I heard that, the thought of being bored never even crossed my mind. (...) Ironically, it's in the places that others would find boring that I find so much, photographically and emotionally. When there aren't any civilized cues to distract your brain, you're most free to think, but also to pick up on visual details that are otherwise over- looked. (...) The road has become so many things to me besides just a place of peace and solitude. It's completely transformed the way I think about people, life, relationships, photography, and what I want for my career. It's also made me fall in love with America, especially the West.
