The tension of war between destruction and the human desire for freedom

Art photographer Gosbert Gottmann reflects on suffering, violence, and war through the experience of the Ukrainian population during the Russian invasion. At its core lies the tension between destruction and the human desire for freedom, safety, and dignity.

Suffering, a central theme in Gottmann's work, is conveyed through abstraction, deformation, and visual disruption. Rather than offering direct representation, faces dissolve, contours blur, and identities are erased.

Between reality and virtuality, a space of resonance emerges that reveals the psychological and structural dimensions of war. A powerful artistic reflection on loss, resilience, and the fragility of freedom, »Freiheit Freedom Воля« is Gottmann's seventh publication with Kehrer Verlag.

From the text Identity and Distortion: The Boundaries of Being Human by Marc Peschke:

An image can only represent the complex and often multidimensional aspects of suffering and violence in a limited way. Gottmann's strategy for dealing with this dilemma is abstraction: where traditional photography casts a direct, often shocking gaze on reality, Gottmann's abstractions work with the avoidance of the concrete.

His pictures largely forgo the realistic representation of pain and destruction, but rather refer to something else. As he once said himself, 'For me it's about finding a view through the surface, a view into a deeper layer, beyond familiar images'. Here, photography is an act of seeing and recognizing that reaches deeper, under the surface of the visible, down to the deepest layers of existence. In the discrepancy and tension between external image and inner reality, in the dialectic between objectivity and subjectivity, lies the captivating allure of these pictures.
